“ So sorry for your loss. I remember once she gave me a book out of the blue (The Girl On The Train). I don't usually enjoy books gifted to me, especially novels, but I just adored this one. I asked her why she chose to give it to me? How did she know I'd like it so much? She laughed and said she didn't know; she just started reading it herself and couldn't stand it so she gave it to me just in case. That memory always makes me smile. Rest In Peace.

“ So sorry to hear of your Moms passing. We were always taken with her humor and zest for life. Her devotion to "certain ball players" and love of a party, and raucous laugh.

Most of all, your devotion to her. The past couple of years have been trying to be sure, and yet, you all signed up and cared for her. That says more about who she was and is, to your memory. She raised decent and compassionate people. Families are complicated, but caring is not. You all are a sweet legacy to Pat. Blessings to your entire family.

“ Spoiled childhood?? Whaaa? There were seven of us. As the oldest sibling, I was obligated to set the example. Until I was married and out of the house, Mom always did the laundry. Wash, dry, iron (yes, t-shirts and jeans, too), fold, and place a neat pile of Richie’s clothes on the steps. The same for Dennis, Linda, Eddie, Matt, Carol, and Pat. The expectation was that we’d pick up our pile the next time we went upstairs, take it to the bedroom and put the clothes in drawers. You know what’s more fun? Running through the living room, making the hard right turn at the bottom of the steps, planting one foot, then launching yourself up 3 or 4 steps, going over the piles of clothes that were so carefully prepared and placed. Of course, you’d never want to get caught in this act. And, if you missed just a little bit, those neat piles would be much less so at the bottom of the stairs. That would usually result in an unpleasant “conversation” with Dad. 😂 We were so blessed to have her raising us. Today we cry. And smile. And laugh. And cry some more. But, you always loved us, from our beginning until your end. And, we’ll continue to love you, forever and ever. We miss you already, Mom. Until we meet again...

“ I remember hopping in the car with you after school and driving to West Coast Video. I would of course pick out Babes in Toyland and we would watch it together singing and snacking on popcorn. It’s my first memory of us having us time. I love you so much💚
